Since his beginnings, Joep Van Lieshout has chased, changed and shaped the borders of art, design and architecture. In his latest series, RENEGADE, instead of performing the act of either artist or designer, Van Lieshout turns any object that he gets his hands on – even his own existing sculptures - into lamps, making every work as valuable or invaluable as the other.

Venice was itself, once, the centre of European trade, a witness to a millennia of market contraction and inflations. Van Lieshout, like the bygone great merchants of Venice, elevates objects and contorts the market to his own will, rather than bending to it. RENEGADE, by being both functional and accessible, challenges the market while giving it what it wants.
